

A QUINTETTE TRUST IS ON

Ellis Boys Merging the Hawaiian Singers Into Clubs.

A musical trust has practically become effective, as far as quintet clubs of the first water are concerned, with the Ellis brothers in control. They have engaged many of the best native vocalists in the city, and recently almost every entertainment has been supplied with a quintet—a sextet or quartet even is popularly styled a "quintet"—controlled by the Ellis boys.

Solomon Hiram still exercises his mastership over his "original quintet club," with the exception that Ben Jones, the famous basso for so many years identified with Solomon, may in future sing with the Ellis boys. Solomon and his quintet, including Ben Jones and James Shaw, the tenor, have achieved no little fame during the past twelve years, and even back into the days of the monarchy. Solomon's forte has been the old Hawaiian songs and all who have heard Solomon, or Ben Jones or Jim Shaw in solos, have had cause to remember them. Travelers have always been full of praise for the Hawaiian singers of Solomon's quintet, but the club is now melting away.

A few years ago John Ellis came into the field. Ellis has a fine voice, especially adapted to solos, and he became in constant demand. A "quintet" was the result of these calls, and by degrees John became indispensable to hostesses and the hotels. First there was one quintet, then there were two and now there are three clubs. It is now a trust to all intents and purposes but not one "in restraint of trade," for there is a demand for nearly all the Hawaiian singers in the city.

However, Solomon is still in the field, and is as popular as ever.
